DEATH PROP

KIM stopped outside the star's dressing room and turned to her escort, Lance Gallant. "I'm glad you were with me when I received the note," she said. "If Claire's life is in danger, she'll feel safer with you here."

She rapped on the door and, when there was no response, she turned the knob and remarked, "I guess Claire hasn't returned from the second act. Let's wait for her in here." She pushed open the door and walked in.

"Powerful perfume your friend uses," Lance said sniffing the air.

"It's Claire's special scent," Kim informed him. "She never wears anything . . ." Kim stopped short and stood frozen with horror. Lance reached her side and glanced on the floor by the dressing table. Lying amid tumbled cosmetic bottles lay Claire Montford, a carved dagger protruding from her throat.

Lance bent swiftly over the girl and took one of her hands. He dropped it and stood up. "I'm afraid she's dead, Kim. You call the police. I'll stay here and stand guard."

After Kim had gone Lance gazed down at the still form. In her left hand she clutched an ornate perfume bottle, the contents of which had spilled to the floor. Lance stooped over the spot it had made and regarded it intently.

His inspection was interrupted by the door opening. A tall, well-dressed man entered. Lance met him just inside, saying, "You can't come in here."

"I'm Paul Miller, producer of this show," he snapped. "I believe I have a right to see Miss Montford."

Lance tried to keep Miller from entering but the producer pushed in angrily. When he saw the body at the dressing table he paled and turned weakly to Lance. "Why didn't you tell me," he choked . . . "you're the police?"

"Temporarily," Lance answered. "Perhaps you can furnish some information. Do you recognize the murder weapon?"

"I believe it's the one Claire used in the last act," Miller said shakily, "but I'll have to check with Peters, our property man."

Lance looked to the door as it reopened and a white-faced Kim slipped in. "The police are on their way," she said.

"You wait here with Miller until they arrive," Lance said. "I want to talk to the property man." Lance left them and hurried to the property room. He swung the door open and stepped into the dim interior.

He had a premonition of danger and turned just as he was struck a heavy blow on the temple.

He awoke face down, bound hand and foot. Painfully he raised his head. He was still in the property room. He twisted his hands behind him and sought the birthmark on his wrist. He rubbed the mark, at the same time calling on the spirit of his dead brother, Michael. Together they became the invincible Captain Triumph.

Triumph flexed his powerful muscles and cast off the restraining bonds. He stood up and strode into the wings. Onstage, a police lieutenant had the cast assembled. He looked over as Captain Triumph entered. "Maybe you can throw some light on this case," he said. "I sure can't. Any one of this cast could have done it."

"There's your man," Captain Triumph said, pointing to an overalled figure. At this challenge the man tried to run offstage, but the crime-buster caught him with a low flying tackle and brought him down.

Paul Miller moved over to where Captain Triumph dragged the burly figure to his feet, "It's Peters, the property man," he said incredulously. "Why should he have killed Claire Montford?"

"His name is not Peters; it's Hans Stark," Captain Triumph explained, "an escaped war criminal. Lance Gallant and I have been looking for him for quite some time."

"Claire Montford," he continued, "having to see Stark every evening when he delivered the property dagger, probably realized she had seen his picture in the papers. No doubt she accused him and he stabbed her with the prop knife."

"You can't prove that," Stark snarled.

"I think so," Captain Triumph said grimly. "Just before Lance Gallant was struck in the property room, he smelled the special perfume Claire Montford always wore. Examination should show that it is all over your shoes and overalls."
